HISTORY

SEVEN VILLAGES, ONE COMMUNITY: THE STORY OF AMANA

The seven villages of the Amana Colonies stand today as testimony to the social and religious diversity of Iowa history and the American experience.

Founded on religious faith and the spirit of community, they continue to evoke both a time gone by and the American dream.

In 1855 members of the German religious group known as the Community of True Inspiration left their homes in Ebenezer, NY to begin construction of a settlement in Iowa. They called their new home "Amana," a biblical name that signifies "remain true." By the end of 1855 the village of Amana was home to 74 community members. Soon, the community had purchased a total of 26,000 acres and established six more villages (Middle Amana, High Amana, West Amana, South Amana, Homestead, and East Amana).

Each village had a church, residences, craft shops and farm. With agriculture and textile production as an economic base, the community flourished, reaching a peak population of 1800 in the late 19th century.

The Community of True Inspiration had its origins in Germany in 1714 as part of a religious movement called Pietism. Like other pietists, the Inspirationists emphasized personal religious experience, piety, and humility. Their belief that God still communicated directly to people just as to the prophets of the Old Testament set them apart from other pietist groups.

Government persecution and difficult economic times forced the community to immigrate to America in 1843.

The villages of the Amana Colony were governed by a council of church elders in a social system based on communal ownership of property. Families were provided with living quarters and household necessities. Communal kitchen houses prepared meals for all members. Each adult worked without wages for the community at assigned jobs in the factories, shops, fields and kitchens.

The communal system in Amana lasted until 1932 when community members voted to abandon communalism and incorporated their economic holdings into a profit-sharing company, Amana Society, Inc.

The religious beliefs and traditions of the community continue today in the re-organized Amana Church Society.

Because of their religious and communal heritage, the Amana Colonies were designated a National Historic Landmark in 1965. Today residents of the seven villages celebrate their community's history as they look to the future. With numerous museums, artisans and interesting shops of all kinds, the villages of Amana invite you to experience their heritage.
